What is involved in the amazing development of the ability to make meaning of marks on a page? Learning to read involves the development of multiple skills and neurocognitive systems as well as the coordination of these skills and systems. I will discuss three key components of reading - orthographic, phonological, and semantic knowledge - from the multiple perspectives of mind, brain, and education to illustrate the rich complexity of the process of building a brain that reads.