This talk will discuss how neuroscience is being applied to questions of literacy, dyslexia and literacy instruction. A particular focus of the talk will be recent studies that explore how new digital technologies are changing what it means to be a successful reader and writer. The studies suggest that digital technology can both reduce the ability gap in certain academic domains, while increasing them in others. The implications of these findings for students of all abilities will be discussed.