From work in her lab that focuses on the timing of neural activity related to language comprehension, Dr. Wicha will present a series of connected studies to show how using brain electrophysiology can help constrain theoretical models for language comprehension. She will begin with an introduction to the technique used to record electrical brain waves, then explore topics such as prediction in a sentence context, bilingual lexical access, and code switching.